Valuation is the most fundamental term founders encounter during a financing round and is crucial to understand when evaluating a term sheet. Valuation is generally thought of two ways - pre-money and post-money. The "pre-money valuation" is the investor's valuation of the company today, before the investment. The "post-money" valuation represents the pre-money valuation PLUS the amount of money raised in the round.

Understanding the Valuation Aspects of a Term Sheet ...

Term sheets are not binding (unless they specifically say so) except for the exclusivity provision which restricts founders from negotiating with other investors for a certain period (usually 30-60 days) after signing the term sheet. The term sheet is followed by a more detailed shareholders agreement which is binding and enforceable.
