The people sent to seize this land at the end of the world were used to life under low grey skies; low and grey were their prospects too. A life on teeming cobbled streets, followed by an eternity in crowded fetid ships, to reach a place of dazzling emptiness – the agoraphobic shock of the first colonials became a thread that ran through the generations of immigrants who followed.

And no doubt, it has a significant psychological impact, that their country is at "the end of the world", far away from wars, political flashpoints and pollution. In addition, it's undoubtedly an attraction for many Danes to visit a country as far away you can get, with a unique flora and fauna , reverse seasons, etc.

New Zealand - the land at the end of the world

Which is why The Land at the End of the World is like reading Antunes's novelistic template. It's very straightforward: Over the course of an entire night, a psychiatrist/writer, back from the war, gets wasted in a bar while seducing a (silent) woman with his tales of anguish and hatred.
